Grief Is Normal

James E. Miller
Tears hinder sorrow from becoming despair.

J. H. Leigh Hunt

Do not let your sorrow come higher than your knees.

Swedish proverb
It’s interesting, and telling, that the assertion “grief is normal” needs to be made at all.

By their words and actions some propose that grief is not normal, that it’s somehow inappropriate or unhealthy.

“They’ve earned their reward and they’re in a better place now,” some survivors may say, “so why should I grieve?”

“I’m relieved the one I’ve loved isn’t suffering any longer,” others may say, “so I’m glad, not sad.”

“We had a long, happy life together,” I once heard a new widow say, “so I have no regrets, no painful feelings; it’s time to move on.”

Some people hold that it’s okay to grieve for several days, or a handful of weeks, but after that it’s no longer standard.

It’s interesting that we don’t ask, “Is joy normal?”

Of course, it is!

Anxiety? Fear? In the face of uncertainty or danger, sure!
It is with deep grief that I learn of the death of your kind and brave father; and, especially, that it is affecting your young heart beyond what is common in such cases.

Abraham Lincoln

(letter to Fanny McCullough, December, 1862)
Beyond any doubt, grief is normal. It is the natural human response to the loss of any significant relationship. Grief can appear as a deep sorrow, a painful anguish, or a strong distress. Whatever its intensity, grief is the vehicle by which a human being acknowledges and feels the loss, adapts to necessary life changes, and eventually moves on to a renewed, though often changed, life.

Can grief ever be abnormal?

Yes, it can, though it’s probably wiser to refer to certain instances of grief as complicated.

Sometimes grief becomes unusually lengthy or turbulent or severe. Sometimes people become stuck in their grief. When these things happen, which is in a minority of cases, it makes sense to turn to professionals for assistance.

But generally grief in and of itself is an expected response to loss—in other words, it’s normal.
